"While my paintings are often based on specific places and special people I have known, I intend for the work to be meaningful to people without my peculiar experience: First, as a straight forward study of some gracefully aging location (an old country church, for instance), then, prompted by that atmosphere, an invitation to speculate with me on what might have gone on there on a day like this, in its heyday of activity. In reality, it is the viewer's own rich memories that give a painting its special appeal, not mine -- not me."
